"Looking over the Meade case, are you?" he asked pleasantly enough as they came up to tell him they would have to trouble him again tomorrow.

"Yes," Rodney answer-d eageriy.
"Did you see any of the trial?"
"There was only one thing to think.
"I saw a lot more of Hollis Meade than I wanted to at the time, and I'd like to see a little bit more of him now."

"What do you mean?" Green asked, impatiently, half hoping the old man might have discovered something not upon the records.
"I was the warden of the prison in them days. He was the only prisoner that ever got away from me. Darn him: I'd like to catch him and see him hung yet."

"What sort of a prisoner did he said any coat on at all.

I long enough to get from him a history of Hollis Meade's escape. It seemed that he had worked without help, managing to bend one of the bars of his cell window until he could squeeze through it at night.

The ex-warden said he had tried for months before to get the county to appropriate money for replacing the bars, which had rusted badly.

After that they went to the hotel which, in court sessions, accommodates the visiting judges, jorors and lawyers. It is a very oid establishment and still serves the old-fashioned dinners that once made country hostelries famous. Over their meal they continued to discuss the case.

Old Jimmy Martin, the proprietor of the hotel, knew Wallace and was ready to tell all he knew of the case of the young man's father.

"What about it?"
"What about it?"
"What about it?"
"What about it?"
"Why, you know, he sold it."
"Sold it!" both young men echoed in astonishment.
"Yep—sold it. One day he got a letter from New York. I let him read it before I looked it over—stood there watchin' him all through.
"It's hard luck for you, though," he said. "For my part, I don't see why steve Warren should make such a fuss about it. It was n't no fault of yours."
